There is something so impressive in the vanishing of a great force of noble intellect out of the world that reverence must pause before the spectacle no less in humility than in sorrow. When such a man as Major Ginter is taken, the ase of loss and of the evanescence of human things comes with keen reality to many hearts. The career and fame of the deceased are identified with bright recollections, and his death has awakened many minds to the sense of mutability and decline.

The high tribute of unvarying respect has been paid to Major Ginter's memory on all sides since the announcement of his death cast a gloom over the city, tender, or more emphatic could be paid to any man than has been paid to the memory of Major Ginter by the display of grief at his decease. He departed in the ripenness of time and the maturity of experience, with all his honors gathered and all the possibiliiles of his career fulfilled. He had finished his work, he had enjoyed in liberal abundance the rewards of success and the laurels and privileges of well-earned

As a token of the high esteem in which Major Ginter was held in this community, it may be mentioned here that a suggestion that a monument should be raised by public subscription has met with a cordial reception.

LEE AND THE SENATE

RICHMOND, VA., TUESDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1897.

THE CONSUL-GENERAL WILL LIKE-LY OPPOSE MR. MARTIN.

NOT PREPARED TO SAY YET.

He Will Not Make the Announcement Until He Is Relieved of the Consulate, But Will Stump the State If He Decides to Run.

General Fitzhugh Lee, Consul-General to Cuba and ex-Governor of Virginia, is in the city. He arrived yesterday afternoon from Lexington, where he has been for several days, and will remain here with his wife and children at the Langey until some time during the latter part of this month, when he will, at the request of President McKinley, return to Cuba, there to remain until a solution of the troubles on that ill-starred island is reached.

The General is looking well. He is not so stout as formerly, but is still the same genial, jovial gentleman he was before the troubles of Cuba were thrust upon his shoulders. General Lee had been in the city but a very short time when he was called upon by a Dispatch man. He very politely but diplomatically declined to discuss Cuban affairs, re-ferring the reporter for all information concerning the doings on the island to the State Department at Washington, where his reports are filed.

He said, however that he did not ex-pect to remain in Cuba throughout the present administration, expressing the he present administration, expressing the be-lief that President McKinley would deide, sconer or later, to send some one of his political friends to that country.

WILL OFFER FOR SENATE

This declaration on the part of the Consul-General led to the suggestion by the reporter that General Lee might decide to again become a candidate for the seat in the United States now occupied by Hon. Thomas S. Martin. General Lee, when the question was first broached, de-clined to discuss it, asserting that so long as he held a consulship he felt that he should refeat from interference. long as he held a consulship he felt that he should refrain from interference in or discussion of State polics. Being pressed, however, the General answered the ques-tions of the reporter, and though he would not say much, it was manifest that he is intent upon having another, ir, at the intent upon having another try at the office which he feets he might have got-

The General expressed himself as heartily in favor of a senatorial primary, and said also that he, as a good Democrat, was willing, at all times, to abide by the arbitrament of his party's conventions. He said he would, under no circumstances, make any announcement of his candidacy for the Sonate, in event that candidacy for the Senate, in event that he decides to become a candidate, until he decides to become a candidate, until he had shaken the harness of Federal office from this shoulders. "If, though, I determine to enter the race," he said, "I shall not sit down and wait for the office to come to me; I shall take the stump and canvass the entire State, from the see to the requiraling." the sea to the mountains."

he always liked to go before the people, could usually convince them that he was right—this with a merry twinkle of his eye. He was never afraid of the people, to them all questions affecting any aspira-tions he might have for political prefer-ment. The question of senatorial pri-maries, he said, was one in which ne thought all good Democrats of Virginia thought all good Democrats of Virginia sigreed. It was not a new one. In speeches made in Mr. Tucker's district two years ago, General Lee spoke strongly in favor of electing the United States senators by popular vote. His opinion on this important subject has undergone pockange since that time making any announcement of the senatorship, or taking any part in advocating his claims for this honor. It, however, does not prevent the ex-Governor's friends prevent the ex-Governor's friends from announcing his candidacy, and looking after his interests in that direction, should it become known that he desires to enter the senatorial fight. During his stay here the Consul-General will see hosts of his old friends, who are always delighted to welcome him to Virginia, and especially to Richmond. It will be the most natural thing in the world for these to talk over with the General his political future in this State. He however, not consent to say that any of these things will be formally discussed

It is pretty safe to assume that when the time comes for the senatorial race General Lee will be in it, and in it with all of his old dash and vim, for which has little to say. He will not discuss the recall of General Weyler or the appointment of the latter's successor. These, and all other matters relating to governmental affairs of Cuba or Spain are not, he says, admissible for him to discuss.
